The agreement "signals that the federal government may be shifting its policy to focus on dispensaries in a way that furthers an expansionist approach that is contrary to federal law," said Alan J. Browne, who represents patients in that case. "The federal government can't go after patients who use these medicines, even if a dispensary offers them the medicine.".. The settlement of the lawsuit involves an amount of $4.2 million agreed to on the condition by the four states to prevent the federal government from charging patients more or seeking to recoup money they spent to get their patients treatment.. But attorneys for the medical marijuana industry said the terms of the settlement provide a chance for the companies involved in the case to build a path forward and get ahead of next week's Supreme Court decision on the constitutionality of the federal government's 2014 Cole memo banning state marijuana laws.. Under the agreement, the four states will stop enforcing the federal ban against medical marijuana dispensaries on Aug. 4, 2015. The states will also pay more than $500,ate - 4:12.. Attorney General Lori Swanson said after hours-long negotiations after hours Tuesday night that she has reached a plea agreement that will set the stage for a trial. After being served with a complaint in the lawsuit, the U.S. Attorney's Office announced Wednesday it will drop its investigation of alleged violations of state and local law after reviewing the agreement between the attorneys general of four states and the Obama administration.. "This settlement is an important first step to help the patients in these states have their right to live with dignity fully protected," the governor said. "I will continue to ensure that patients and families are safe from harm and pain, and that these companies with business before the people are held to honor all laws and values."..
